Do we look forward or back in life? We are told that the ideal is to live in the present. But as human beings our lives are coloured by our memories. If we were hurt badly or received little love when we were young, much of our lives may be spent in trying to heal those wounds. If we were loved and helped to be secure by our parents, families and friends, we tend to be more confident and face our world with trust and openness.

It may seem odd, but if we are happy as children, we tend to leave home more easily. If we are sad, the break can be more difficult, as though tentacles of unresolved issues and guilt tie us to the past like rampant bindweed. It can also be more difficult to see alternative ways of being. It is as though our imaginations are dulled, the freedom of our spirits curtailed. We look forward fearfully. Whatever we do, we feel things are likely to go wrong, and we will repeat the patterns of our childhood. Sometimes, in contrast, we react by becoming wildly optimistic. This time I will get it right. This time all will be well. But such hopes are often based on what we desire others to do for us and not upon an awareness of ourselves or how we might make things different. We swing between fond hopes and near despair. There is little acceptance of the mixture of good and bad in each of us, knowledge of which helps us move forward realistically with patience and humour.

As Jesus hangs on the cross, he is surrounded by the crowd and their jeering leaders. The language is that of anger and disappointment. Some of them might have had hopes that Jesus would be the Chosen One who would free them from the yoke of the Romans. Others might have been upset by his clear teaching that the way of the Chosen One was not that of political rebellion. In both cases they are stuck in the past. Once they had kings. Once they had been an independent people. A king should have the power to save himself as well as others. The soldiers and one of the criminals join the mocking. Their limited understanding is given ironic expression in the inscription put above him: "This is the King of the Jews."

As so often in the Gospels, the truth lies elsewhere. Jesus calls for a vision that goes beyond our ordinary way of thinking. So many of his detractors want Jesus to make their lives easy, to heal their ills and free them from oppression. There is no sense of their own responsibilities or contribution they might make. This is the difference between them and the good criminal. He understands clearly his own self. He is a criminal who is being justly punished for what he has done and accepts it. But he still has hope. Through reconciliation and through trust in Jesus he might yet be saved. In his response Jesus recognises his faith with the promise that he is already reconciled; he is already in the kingdom.

If we are to be like the good criminal, we too need to have a clear picture of who we are and also that same underlying trust in Christ. St Paul speaks of how everything in heaven and everything on earth is reconciled in Christ. Christ holds all things in unity; he takes us out of our darkness of misunderstanding, failure and despair, and makes it possible for us to join the saints and with them inherit the light. If we look back, it is to judge ourselves as accurately as possible. The aim is neither to blank out our responsibility for who we are nor to become enmeshed in a sense of guilt and failure. Sometimes we blame ourselves too much, sometimes we blame others, but either way we become caught up in false hopes and expectations.

The miracle does not lie in someone waving a magic wand to wipe out all that is difficult in our lives. The miracle lies in our encounter with Christ that takes us forward through his healing and reconciling power. It is this power, celebrated especially in the sacrament of reconciliation but also in the whole of our sacramental life, that enables us to continue to grow in the life of faith on earth and to share in the fullness of God's glory in heaven.
